Degree Overview

School Direct is a government-led initiative that seeks to place schools at the centre of Initial Teacher Education (ITE). Working with University of Roehampton, our partner schools take a leading role in recruiting trainee teachers and in designing and delivering the training programme. This is open to high quality graduates, often to people coming to teaching from other careers. Applications are made to individual schools or alliances of schools. The schools pay a salary based on that of an unqualified teacher but there is no government bursary paid for secondary specialisms that attract a bursary for those on the tuition fee route. Trainees carry out training both at Roehampton and within their school.

alliance.

Study Reasons

- Roehampton offers an unusually wide range of secondary subject specialism and has training partnerships – primary and secondary- with over 150 schools
- Successful completion will give you 60 master's level credit, which can be carried forward to further study within a window of five years
