Additional information

Degree Overview

Through this course you'll study many of the modules you would take as part of the BSc (Hons) in Psychology, along with specialist modules designed to provide you with understanding of the theory and practice of counselling.

Your studies will help you gain a strong understanding of core psychological concepts and practices, and the professional applications of psychology, whilst learning concepts, ethics and techniques related to counselling.

You will undertake your own research, and complete a dissertation which will bring together your expertise in psychology and counselling.

Bradford offers clear Master's and PhD progression routes from this BSc (Hons) programme. Entry to areas such as clinical, occupational, forensic, counselling, health or educational psychology requires a postgraduate qualification following a first degree in psychology accredited by the British Psychological Society.
