Programme benefits

Why choose our specialization?

We invite you to join us on a journey to become an expert in the field of community organization management.

There are more than 103,000 nonprofit organizations in Poland with more than 8.3 million people (data for 2022). The management of a nonprofit organization is characterized by various aspects that distinguish it from the management of a regular for-profit business.

First and foremost, nonprofit organizations are often characterized by a strong sense of mission and social commitment, which can influence organizational culture, while in for-profit organizations there is often more emphasis on achieving business goals and market competitiveness.

In nonprofit organizations, success is often measured by social metrics, such as community impact, number of people helped, or improved quality of life, while in for-profit organizations success is often measured by financial metrics, such as net profit, revenue, or increased goodwill. In addition, NGOs often require management to take into account a variety of stakeholders, such as donors, volunteers, beneficiaries, which can lead to a more complex management structure compared to for-profit organizations, where the main goal is usually to maximize shareholder value. Ultimately, too, NGO's business model often depends on donations, grants, subsidies and government funds as the main source of funding, while for-profit organizations generate income by selling products or services.
