Degree Overview

In the past years, the fast development of technology has led the media industry to develop a focus on digital and technical mediums and formats in all sectors such as TV, video, radio, or social media content,

The media Production degree at DMU is an industry-focused course, which provides you with the technical foundations and practical skills required for a career in a rapidly changing media landscape, enabling you to pursue roles in industries such as advertising, TV and radio production, journalism and PR.

Modules taught on this course include image capture and processing, audio recording and production, television documentary production, radio location production, creative media entrepreneurship and social media innovation.

Study Reasons

Previous Media Production students have taken part in live filming on DMU's campus for Channel 4 and worked at the BBC and ITV.

DMU offers its students specialist facilities, including audio recording studios, broadcast-standard radio production studios and management systems, standalone film studios equipped with multi-cameras, as well as blue and green screen studios.

Work placements are offered as part of this course through DMU Works, and can boost your skills and experience while studying, as well as improving your chances of gaining a graduate level job.
